Acknowledgments

This book has drawn on research accumulated over an unusually lengthy period. However, it would have remained unwritten but for Research Leave funding from the Arts and Humanities Research Council and study leave from the University of Leeds. I am grateful to both institutions for their support, likewise to the Marc Fitch Fund for a generous grant in aid of publication. The support of my colleagues at Leeds, in both the School of Continuing Education and the School of History, has been very important.

My profound thanks are due to the many institutions on whose holdings I have drawn, and to their staff who have so cheerfully assisted me. Among London repositories I owe thanks to Bishopsgate Institute, the British Library (St Pancras), the British Newspaper Library (Colindale), the Goldsmiths Library of Economic Literature (University of London, Senate House), the London School of Economics and the National Archives at Kew. In Manchester I should like to thank the archivists at the Co-operative College and the Labour History Archive & Study Centre at the National Museum of Labour History. I acknowledge also the assistance of staff at the museums' services of Ayrshire and Newport, at Wilton Lodge Museum, Hawick, at York Minster Library, the libraries of Staffordshire University and the University of York, and that of the library volunteers at the incomparable Whitby Literary and Philosophical Society. For over two decades I have been a voracious user of the Brotherton Library of the University of Leeds, an exceptional resource with an exceptional staff. My grateful thanks go to them all.

I am particularly indebted to the staff of the following municipal libraries, archives and local studies' centres: Barnsley, Birmingham, Bolton, Bradford, Dartford, Derby, Leeds, Manchester, Middlesbrough, Newcastle upon Tyne, Newport, Oldham, Stockport, Sunderland, Tameside (Ashton-under-Lyne and Stalybridge), Warwick, York and the West Yorkshire Archives Service in Bradford and Leeds.

My approach to trying to read the Northern Star 'innocently' was, over the space of several years, to browse through issues in chronological order, recording impressions and quotations into a dictation machine as I went along.

This would have been impossible, however, without the help of Sheila Salvin and, especially, Joan Winpenny (both of the School of Continuing Education, University of Leeds) who painstakingly transcribed the tapes that emerged each Monday morning from this exercise.

Presenting papers to a wide range of seminars and conferences on different aspects of Chartism has helped focus my thoughts, provided bracing scrutiny of the same and corrected countless misapprehensions. It would be invidious to mention some of these and not others, so I thank them all. I do wish to place on record, though, my appreciation of successive groups of students whose enthusiasm and informed participation in courses related to Chartism has done so much to enhance my understanding of the movement.

Debts of a more personal nature are legion. None of the following bears any responsibility for the defects of this work, but in different ways each has helped with its progress: Owen Ashton, John Baxter, Fabrice Bensimon, my parents Sherwin and Elizabeth Chase, Chris Close, Sean Creighton, Dodford Independent Electors, Stephen Duncombe, Richard Floyd, James Gregory, Robert Hall, Julian Harber, John Harrison, Ian Haywood, Ronald Morris, Ian Packer, Mike Sanders, Dorothy Thompson, William Turner, Roy Vickers and an anonymous reader. My colleague David Goodway was an important and unflagging source of encouragement. I am especially indebted to Eduardo Trigo O'Connor d'Arlach for allowing me to quote from the correspondence of Feargus and Francisco Burdett O'Connor (and to James Dunkerley for facilitating this) and to Angela Killick for her enthusiastic response to my request to make use of Ann Dawson's sampler.

'I know no person living', wrote Thomas Cooper in his autobiography, 'who could write a History of Chartism without making mistakes. I am sure that I could not.' There would be many more mistakes in the pages that follow were it not for Shirley Chase. She has nurtured this book, read successive drafts and her considered advice has enhanced it all. As always, our daughter Sarah helped keep everything in the most cheerful of perspectives. This book is theirs too.
