This book began as a seminar paper and then grew into a dissertation under the able guidance of Jeanne Peterson, whose combination of warmth and intellectual rigour continues to delight and inspire me. While at Indiana University, and in the years since, I have also benefited from the guidance and encouragement of James Eli Adams, Dyan Elliott, Andrew Miller, Robert Orsi, and David Pace; I remain grateful to all of them for their early and continuing support.

During the years in which this project evolved into a book, I received valuable assistance in many forms, including citations, hospitality, and encouragement, from A. M. Allchin, Miriam Bailin, Joep van Beeck, Sarah Boss, Andrew Bradstock, Eamon Carroll, the late Caspar Caulfield, Sally Cunneen, Sheridan Gilley, Helen Hackett, Mary Heimann, Stanley and Mollie Hood, Ian Ker, Gerry Magill, Jeremy Morris, Denis Paz, Geoffrey Rowell, Alison Shell, and Michael Wheeler. I am grateful also to the two anonymous readers from Manchester University Press for their thoughtful comments and useful suggestions for improving the manuscript. The editors at Manchester University Press have made the publication process easier and more rewarding than I ever could have hoped.

I have been blessed with a group of friends and colleagues on both sides of the Atlantic who have provided both the intellectual support without which this book would not have been written and the friendship that makes the research and writing more enjoyable. My deepest thanks to Scott Beasley, Stephen Chapman, John Chappell, Paul Deslandes, Alice Dreger, Michael Drolet, Dan Fenton, Debbie Gershenowitz, Leigh Hayden, Maria LaMonaca, John LaRocca, Patrick Leary, Laura Leming, Scott Lewis, Laura Luehrmann, Joan Milligan, Lydia Murdoch, Paul Murphy, Paul Nagle, Hilary Nightingale, Richard Pierce, Anne Rodrick, Caroline Rose, Michael Suarez, Andrena and Bill Telford, and Liann Tsoukas. Over weekly burritos and margaritas Una Cadegan has encouraged and challenged my ideas on religion and culture, while the most collegial and congenial VICKIs – Rick Incurvati, Barry Milligan, Chris Oldstone-Moore, and Tammy Proctor – have read and commented extensively on drafts of these chapters.

I could not have written this book without the assistance of the archivists and librarians at Indiana University, the British Library, Pusey House, the Bodleian Library, the Birmingham Oratory, the Cambridge University Library, Dr Williams's Library, Lambeth Palace Library, St Deniol's Library, the Vatican archives in Rome, and Wright State University. Among this group, Fr William Davage of Pusey House deserves special mention for his many kindnesses.

Funding for various stages of this book came from Indiana University, in the form of grants and the Victorian Studies Fellowship, Wright State University, in the form of travel grants, and St Deniol's Library, Hawarden, Wales, which generously offered a scholarship during the final stages of my research. Support in the form of boundless hospitality and a room of my own in London came from two wonderful families, Bobbie Brown's and Carla and Ingo Franke's. Without the conversations, meals, and interest in what I had found in the archives and libraries that both families provided, my trips to London would have been more infrequent, briefer, and far less congenial.

It was at the family dinner table that I first learned to talk about religion, to ask even unanswerable questions, and to debate ideas. My parents, Kath and Tom Engelhardt, are models of commitment, faith, intellectual curiosity, social responsibility, and joy to those around them, while my siblings and their spouses – Marybeth and Mark Lumetta, Christin Engelhardt, Mark Engelhardt, and Moira Konrad – have been the best support network a scholar could want. Michael, Katherine, Stephen, and Clare Lumetta have been, and continue to be, welcome and joyful distractions from the library.

Finally, I am ignoring Tom Herringer's instructions that he not be thanked here, because I know, even if he does not, the role he played in making the final stages of this project easier, by listening to me talk about the most arcane details of nineteenth-century theology, asking insightful questions, and always knowing when to take me out to dinner. I happily look forward to equal amounts of help on the next project, and to a lifetime of shared passions.

As joyfully as I acknowledge the assistance of those above, I must equally firmly claim responsibility for any errors that follow.
