Acknowledgements

The authors would like to thank the Economic and Social Research Council for their generous support of the research project of which this book is the main outcome (ESRC Research Award R000239691, Principal Award Holder: Edwin Bacon). This award enabled the appointment of Bettina Renz as the project's Research Fellow, as well as supporting research trips to Russia.

The project was initially applied for from the Centre for Russian and East European Studies, the University of Birmingham. However, it moved with the project leader, Edwin Bacon, to Bishop Grosseteste College in Lincoln, during his secondment there as Director of Research. Although the project's topic by no means fitted the disciplinary profile of BGC, the College readily agreed to host it. We are grateful to the then Principal, Professor Eileen Baker, for her support in enabling this, and to her successor, Professor Muriel Robinson, for the continuation of such support as the project came to an end. Thanks are due too to many others at BGC: to academic colleagues for their interest in the project's work, to staff who assisted with the administrative side of the project, to the IT department for facilitating the hosting of the project website at BGC, and to Becky Bull for being part of the 'Research House' team. It was at BGC too that we were able to employ Margarita Stewart, who provided secretarial support and whose native Russian went above and beyond her post's job description.

Throughout the research for this book, the authors' intellectual home has been the Centre for Russian and East European Studies (CREES), the University of Birmingham, where the project's co-applicant and author of the chapter on the economy, Julian Cooper, is Professor of Russian Economic Studies. The support of our Birmingham colleagues has been vital, particularly in the latter stages of completing this book, when all three authors were once again based at CREES.

In Moscow the assistance and friendship of Emilia Kosterina was a vital factor in making our research trips enjoyable and fruitful. Similarly we appreciate greatly the time given by our many interviewees – journalists, members of parliament, representatives of non-governmental organisations, and academics. There are too many to list here, but without exception they added to whatever understanding of Russian affairs is accrued in this work.

We are grateful to our editor at MUP, Tony Mason, for his straightforward and sympathetic approach, and to the anonymous reviewer of the final manuscript, whose encouragement and critique alike proved beneficial.

Finally, we dedicate this book to our families, whose unfailing support has been invaluable throughout the period of its writing.
