Acknowledgements

In the course of writing this book I have acquired numerous debts. The earliest version of this work was submitted as a DPhil thesis at Nuffield College, Oxford. I am grateful to Oxford University's Pirie-Reid fund for their financial support during the writing of the thesis, and to Nuffield College for electing me to a Nuffield studentship. After completing my doctorate, I was fortunate to be awarded a post-doctoral research fellowship at Mansfield College, Oxford; I thank the Principal and Fellows of Mansfield for electing me to this position and for providing such a congenial setting in which to complete my work on this book.

My greatest academic debt is to Michael Freeden, who was a wise and generous supervisor of my doctoral thesis, and who has been an unstinting supporter of this project in all of its guises. As will become apparent in the following pages, I have learned a great deal from his important work on the political thought of the British Left. David Miller, my college supervisor at Nuffield, was also immensely helpful, and he generously read many early drafts. I have benefited from the comments of many other outstanding scholars during my work on this book. I am grateful to Michael Kenny, Gregg McClymont, Marc Stears and Stuart White, all of whom read and commented on earlier drafts of some or all of this material. I am particularly grateful to Gregg and Stuart, who had the dubious honour of reading multiple drafts, starting with my very earliest and sketchiest musings. I would also like to thank the following friends and colleagues for comments and discussions that have shaped my thinking during the book's gestation: Christopher Brooke, Daniel Butt, Clare Chambers, Simon Cox, John Davis, Brian Gibson, Ewen Green, Jose Harris, Martin McIvor, Karma Nabulsi, Paul Segal, Derek Sloan, Nicholas Stargardt, Ryszard Stemplowski, Adam Swift and Sam Taylor.

While researching this book I received expert assistance from the staff at various libraries and archives, especially the Bodleian Library, Oxford; the British Library of Political and Economic Science; and Nuffield College Library, Oxford. I am also grateful to John Callaghan, Steven Fielding and Steve Ludlam, the editors of the series this book appears in, and to the staff at Manchester University Press, for their interest in this project, and for their helpful advice as I brought it to completion.

The following people and institutions have very kindly granted me permission to quote from private papers: the British Library of Political and Economic Science; the Fabian Society; Nuffield College Library; Ann Oakley; University College London Library; and Seymour J. Weissman. Earlier versions of material in Chapters 3 and 5 previously appeared in articles I published in the Journal of Political Ideologies, 8 (2003), 83–110 and in History of Political Thought, 25 (2004), 508–35 respectively. A few sentences in Chapters 2 and 7 are drawn from articles previously published in Public Policy Research, 12 (2005), 140–7 and in Twentieth Century British History, 16 (2005), 416–40 respectively. Thanks are due to the editors and publishers of these journals for their permission to reproduce this material here.

My greatest debt is to my parents, Edward and Jacqueline Jackson, whose unfailing support has been essential to this project from the very start. My brother, Daniel Jackson, kindly contributed constant solicitousness about when, exactly, the book would be finished. I am very grateful to Zofia Stemplowska, who has read this book in all of its various drafts almost as many times as I have, but with considerably greater enthusiasm. Her comments on the text were indispensable, and have greatly improved the clarity and coherence of my arguments; her advice, support and encouragement were just as essential.

I am sorry that I will not be able to show this book to my grandparents, John and Mary McGavin. They lived through the period it discusses, and I would have liked to talk to them again about what I have learned. Their generosity was crucial, and it remained with me during my work on this book. I dedicate the book to their memory.

Ben Jackson
Oxford, August 2006