Acknowledgements

The research and writing of this book was made possible through the generosity of many institutions and people. I am grateful for having had the financial support of Northwestern University as well as a grant from the English-Speaking Union. In addition, a summer research grant from Misericordia University allowed me to revise this work from a dissertation into a book manuscript.

The support of friends and family were also vital to the completion of this book. Several research trips and conference presentations would have been impossible without the enthusiastic help of Tom Briggs, Sharon Turnbull, and Bill Turnbull. Thank you also to Lynn and Howard Marsh for welcoming me into your homes, in both London and Maryland.

My thanks to the staff at the National Archives, the British Library, the Archive Centre at King's College, Cambridge, the Churchill College Archives, the Mass Observation Archive, and the Library of Congress. I am particularly indebted to Jacqueline Kavanagh and the archivists at the BBC Written Archives Centre at Caversham. My research at the archive would have been significantly less productive and less pleasant without them. A special word of appreciation to Jeff Walden—I am grateful to have been the beneficiary of his vast knowledge of the Centre's holdings.

I would like to express my gratitude to the committee that oversaw the doctoral dissertation upon which this book is based: Alex Owen, James Schwoch, John Bushnell, and T. W. Heyck. Their comments and support were pivotal to both my completing the dissertation and revising it into a book manuscript. Thanks to my colleagues at Misericordia University, David Wright, Rebecca Steinberger, and Allan Austin, for reading and commenting on Chapter 4. Guy Ortolano, Mark Hampton, and Jamie Medhurst read selected chapters, which were enriched by their queries and comments. The readers at Manchester University Press provided numerous helpful suggestions and saved me from making a few embarrassing gaffes. Thanks to everyone at Manchester University Press who contributed to the preparation of this book and to Jeffrey Richards, for supporting its inclusion in the Studies in Popular Culture series. I would also like to recognize my earliest mentors, Seth Koven and Dermot Quinn, both of whom made a major impact on my understanding of history.

Portions of Chapters 1 and 2 appeared in Joel H. Wiener and Mark Hampton, eds., Anglo-American Media Interactions (Palgrave Macmillan, 2007), and are reproduced with permission of Palgrave Macmillan, as well as my article, "The BBC, the Empire, and the Second World War," Historical Journal of Film, Radio and Television, 22 (2002): 135–55 (Taylor & Francis). I would also like to thank the following for permission to reprint copyrighted material: the British Broadcasting Corporation, Rory Johnston, and Rory J. Brocklebank. Every effort has been made to trace copyright and contact copyright holders.

The original idea for this book goes back to a lunch I shared with T. W. Heyck at Clarke's, in Evanston. From that point on, Bill proved to be an ideal mentor and guide. This book would never have been completed without his provocative questions, criticisms, and continued encouragement. He saw the value of this project long before I did, and for that I am deeply grateful.

To my wife Kerri I can finally say that it only seemed like I would never finish this book. I cannot thank her enough for her deep reserves of patience and forbearance. I want Tommy, Alex, and Luke to know that they were always a welcome distraction, even if it did not always seem so at the time. Finally, I would like to dedicate this book to my parents, Ann and Robert Hajkowski.
