Acknowledgements

I read my first Doris Lessing novel, Martha Quest, in the third year of my English degree at Liverpool University. It was a set text on a course called 'The Art of the Novel', taught by Simon Dentith. I continued working on Lessing's fiction as part of my PhD thesis and in my first single-authored book, Twentieth-Century Women Novelists: Feminist Theory into Practice (2001), included sections on The Golden Notebook and the short story 'To Room Nineteen'. I have taught Lessing's work often and continue to think that her writing is ambitious and thought provoking, if often misunderstood. Students' reactions to her work have often endorsed this perception and I would particularly like to thank the students on my MA Contemporary Literatures module – 'Doris Lessing: Narrating Nation and Identity' – for their insights and open-mindedness.

My motivation for writing this book was to try to understand Lessing's writing as part of a continued engagement with colonialism, decolonisation, race, nation and empire; I also wanted to consider how Lessing's work connects these ideas with concepts of gender, class and age.

This book was finished during a period of research leave funded by the School of Cultural Studies at Leeds Metropolitan University in semester 2, 2008–9 and I would like to thank the School for supporting the project. In 2004 I gave a paper at the First International Doris Lessing Conference in New Orleans and met several US Lessing scholars: Judith Kegan Gardiner, Debrah Raschke, Roberta Rubenstein, Phyllis Perrakis, Sandra Singer and Christine Sizemore have all been particularly supportive of my work and I would like to thank them here. I would also like to thank the School for funding my attendance at the Conference.

In 2007 I organised the Second International Conference on Lessing's work at Leeds Metropolitan University. The School of Cultural Studies hosted this event and supported it financially, as did the Doris Lessing Society. The Conference was a wonderful creative and intellectual spur for this book. I would like to thank several people for their help during the Conference: Pat Cook and Elaine Newsome provided invaluable administrative support. All the members of the steering group of CWWN (Contemporary Women's Writing Network), particularly Professors Lucie Armitt, Mary Eagleton and Clare Hanson and Dr Alice Ridout, gave of their intellectual input, time and moral support during the stressful period of the Conference itself, as did the members of the English Literature team at Leeds Met. I would particularly like to thank Mary and Alice for their friendship and for many interesting discussions about Lessing, and also John Thieme, series editor for Contemporary World Writers, for his enthusiasm for Lessing's work and this book. Lastly, I want to thank Ian Strange for his support and encouragement always.

Earlier versions of particular sections of chapters 2, 4, 5 and 6 previously appeared in the following places: Susan Watkins, 'Going "Home": Exile and Nostalgia in the Writing of Doris Lessing', in Women's Writing 1945–60: After the Deluge, ed. Jane Dowson, 2003, Palgrave Macmillan, pp. 191–204, reproduced with permission of Palgrave Macmillan; 'The "Jane Somers" Hoax: Aging, Gender and the Literary Marketplace', in Doris Lessing: Border Crossings, eds Alice Ridout and Susan Watkins, London: Continuum, 2009, pp. 75–91, reproduced with permission of Continuum; 'Writing in a Minor Key', Doris Lessing Studies, 25, 2, 2006, 6–10; 'Writing in a Minor Key: Doris Lessing's Late Twentieth-Century Fiction', in Doris Lessing: Interrogating the Times, eds Phyllis Perrakis, Debrah Raschke and Sandra Singer, Columbus: Ohio State University Press, 2010, reproduced with permission of Ohio State University Press; '"Grande Dame or New Woman?": Doris Lessing and the Palimpsest', LIT: Literature, Interpretation, Theory, 17, 3–4, 2006, 243–62, reproduced with permission of Taylor and Francis; Susan Watkins, 'Remembering Home: Nation and Identity in the Recent Writing of Doris Lessing', 2007, Feminist Review, 85, 97–115, reproduced with permission of Palgrave.