This book is one of the outcomes of the research project 'Cultures of British Television Drama, 1960–82', funded by the Arts and Humanities Research Council. Research was undertaken in 2002–05 by Lez Cooke and Helen Wheatley, and the project was managed by Jonathan Bignell, John Ellis and myself, at the University of Reading, Royal Holloway University of London, and Manchester Metropolitan University.

Although this book bears my name alone, it would not have been possible without the help, support and advice of a great many people. First, I would like to thank Jonathan Bignell and Sarah Cardwell, the editors of the series in which this monograph appears, for suggesting that I write it in the first place. Thanks are due, too, to the editorial team at MUP who have answered my queries with patience and clarity (often when I have shown neither). I also owe a debt to generations of students who have responded to, and often challenged, my thinking about realism, television drama and Tony Garnett's work, especially the TV Drama Critical Option groups (1998–2001) in the Department of Film, Theatre and Television at the University of Reading (you know who you are). Special thanks are due to Karen Shepherdson, who generously allowed me to read and refer to her unpublished PhD thesis on Garnett's work, and who provided me with some vital primary source material; also Lez Cooke, not only for his wide-ranging work on British television drama, but also for allowing me access to unpublished interview material. I am particularly grateful to Helen Saunders, Tony Garnett's PA at World Productions, who answered all my requests for information and material promptly and with good humour.

Most of all, I am extremely grateful to Tony Garnett for his generosity and time in granting me several interviews, and giving me access to hard-to-come-by programmes. He has been unfailingly courteous, helpful and articulate (although I, of course, take responsibility for the use I have made of the material). I hope I have done the work justice.

And last of all my family, to whom this book is dedicated, for their support, patience and love.
