ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

My first expression of appreciation must go to the Arts and Humanities Research Board (now Council) of the United Kingdom. The Board placed such faith in the Research Institute of Irish and Scottish Studies (RISS) at the University of Aberdeen as to fund it exceptionally generously. My research trips to South Africa were made possible as a result of a grant from the AHRB funds of the Institute. RISS was founded and expertly developed by Tom Devine, and I am grateful to him as colleague and friend for much support and stimulation. Among the other members of RISS and the Department of History at Aberdeen (past and present) I must also acknowledge the warmly affectionate help of Roy Bridges, John Hargreaves, Marjory Harper, Alan Macinnes, Angela McCarthy, Steve Murdoch, Andrew Mackillop, Nick Evans and the many participants, too numerous to mention (but many appear in endnotes), at lively Aberdeen conferences and symposia.

In South Africa and elsewhere in Africa I must thank the following for friendship, hospitality and help with bibliographies and ideas: Vivian and Claudia Bickford Smith, Nigel Worden, the Rev. James Patrick, John and Barbara Lambert, Jane and Vincent Carruthers, Jonathan Hyslop, Natasha Erlank, Donal McCracken, Peter Merrington, Gordon Pirie, Julian Cobbing, Christopher Saunders, Greg Cuthbertson, Bridget Theron and Reuben Matheka. In Britain I have long been indebted to William Beinart, Saul Dubow, Douglas Hamilton, Richard Grove, Richard Rathbone, David Anderson, Avril Powell, Frank Dikotter, Stephen Constantine, Jeffrey Richards, Shula Marks, Tom Tomlinson, Ian Brown, Wayne Dooling, Justin Willis, Cherry Leonardi, Peter Marshall, Nigel Rigby, Aubrey Newman, Gareth Griffiths, Elizabeth Buettner, Miles Taylor and others interested in questions of ethnicity, identity and empire. I have been fortunate in developing considerable scholarly networks through the Studies in Imperialism series, which I have edited for more than twenty years. In Europe colleagues such as Robert Ross, Nicola Labanca, Sandrine Lemaire, Joachim Miggelbrink, Giuseppe Finaldi (now in Australia), Hermann Hiery, Vincent Kuitenbrower, Klaus Bade, Bernhard Gissibl, Jürgen Osterhammel and Stig Forster helped even when they were unaware of doing so.

Broader issues of Scots and the empire have been debated with Jenni Calder, David Forsyth, Michael Fry, Angus Calder, Chandrika Kaul, Bruce Lenman, Michael Bentley, Christopher Smout, Eliza Riedi, Elizabeth Buettner and Esther Breitenbach. In the missionary historians' network I have been fortunate to work with Brian Stanley, Andrew Porter, Andrew Walls, Jed Brown, Andrew Ross and others. Overseas, David McNab, Chris Youé, Peter Henshaw and Robert Kubicek have always been supportive in Canada, as have Eric Richards, Jim Hammerton, Norman Etherington, Derek Schreuder, Patricia Grimshaw, Kirsten McKenzie and others in Australia, as well as James Belich, John Cookson, Tom Brooking, Katie Pickles and Jennie Coleman in New Zealand.

Archivists and librarians in Britain, Canada, Australia, New Zealand and above all in South Africa have contributed in some shape or form to this work. In the latter, the staffs of the following have been particularly helpful: the Archives of the Western Cape (particularly Jacob van der Merwe), the South African Library, the library of the University of Cape Town, the National Archives in Pretoria, the superb Archives and Africana collection of the University of South Africa (where Marié Coetzee knew her collection so well that she spent a day pulling out sources for us), the National Library in Pretoria (undergoing some much needed refurbishment), the Archives of KwaZulu Natal in Pietermaritzburg, the library of the University of KwaZulu Natal (particularly the excellent support of Margaret Bass), the Natal Society Library (now the copyright library of KZN) and the Cory Library in Grahamstown. The Cory has now emerged as my favourite library. There the head librarian, Shirley Stewart, the User Services librarian, Zweliyanyikima Jackson Vena and the librarians Shirley Kabwato and Victor Velile Gacula were unstinting in finding material from its rich collections.

Richard Price (working on the history of British Kaffraria) helped to make a period of work in the Western Cape archives interesting and pleasurable, as did Elizabeth van Heyningen in both Pretoria and Pietermaritzburg while pursuing her research on the medical aspects of the Anglo-Boer War concentration camps. My old friend Terry Barringer, formerly librarian of the wonderful library of the Royal Commonwealth Society (for long my favourite library), so sadly moved from its great location in Northumberland Avenue, London, to the Cambridge University Library, has been an indefatigable correspondent, bibliographer and supplier of review copies. Her knowledge of missionary history, among much else, has been invaluable. Our friends and neighbours Tam and Morag Thomson kindly provided the use of their Edinburgh flat while we worked at the National Library of Scotland. Our other friends and neighbours, Rob and Margaret Kidd, kindly collected us from stations and airports. Thomsons and Kidds provided much agreeable hospitality, as did Sir William Macpherson of Cluny, whose family archive located at Newton Castle is unrivalled. Another neighbour, Donald MacLeod, provided Gaelic translations. The minister of Alyth, the Rev. Neil Gardner, has become an inspirational friend and supporter. Nigel Dalziel, who accompanied me on visits to South Africa and was a devoted fellow researcher in building up the materials on which this book is based, rightly takes his place on the title page. However, the book was written by J. M. M. and any errors are his alone.
