Acknowledgements

I am indebted to the Arts and Humanities Research Council, without whose generous sponsorship during 2005–2007 this project may not have been accomplished. Further, I wish to thank the Josephine Butler Memorial Trust for funding the initial stages of my research.

Librarians and archivists of the British Library, the British Newspaper Library, Bishopsgate Library, the London School of Economics and Political Science, the John Rylands Library (University of Manchester), the Women's Library (London Metropolitan University), North-Western University (Illinois), Newnham College, St John's College, Girton College and the University Library in Cambridge, Manchester Central Library, the Mary Evans Picture Library, the Cheshire Archives and Local Studies Centre, Macclesfield Library, the University of Hull and the University of Portsmouth were all extremely helpful. Particular thanks go to Julie Weller of Portsmouth University library, whose talent for tracking down inter-library loans during the past six years was exceptional and deeply appreciated. At Manchester University Press I must thank my Editor, Emma Brennan and the anonymous readers, for their timely suggestions for revisions.

In Elizabeth Wolstenholme Elmy's home town of Congleton, I acknowledge the help and assistance I received from Jeremy Condliffe, editor of the Congleton Chronicle and his staff. The week spent researching the archives in the basement of the newspaper offices is one my husband and I will long remember. Thanks are due to Jean Squires and Lyndon Murgatroyd, whose local knowledge of Congleton also proved invaluable, and to the staff and researchers at Congleton Museum. Thanks are also due to Ruth Strong, archivist of Fulneck School, Pudsey for opening up some long hidden details of Elizabeth's childhood and to Mrs Janice McGrath for permission to publish from her late father's reminiscences of the village of Roe Green. In addition, grateful thanks go to Susan Talbot of the Independent Methodist Church, Roe Green for her help in locating an image of the 1855 chapel.

I owe much to June Purvis, who was the first to stimulate my interest in this project and fostered its development. Thanks also to June Hannam, Matthew Taylor and Brad Beaven for their comments on a preliminary version of this manuscript. To my colleagues at Portsmouth (who have lived with the production of this book now for numerous years) the word 'thanks' seems quite inadequate. From undergraduate days you have nurtured my enthusiasm for history and, significantly, have helped to foster a liking for the nineteenth century I would have wondered at a decade ago. To David Andress, Sue Bruley and Robert James I offer particular thanks, both for their friendship and for their insightful criticism.

An author's life is sometimes an isolated one and friends and family are crucial in keeping a knowledge of the 'outside world' alive. Thus I must express a profound debt of gratitude to my husband, Frank and to my mother, Muriel Smith for their constant and loving support. Both have 'lived' with Elizabeth as they have lived with me for, as is now universally acknowledged, biographers cannot and do not remain aloof from their subjects. Both have also read and commented extensively on my writing, equally in times of productivity and frustration and have developed a deep admiration for Elizabeth, both as an individual and as a social reformer. Another family, Marcia, David and Katrina Wright welcomed me into their home for extensive periods during the progress of my research, for which I offer my profound gratitude. For Anne Le Fevre, whose example I followed in returning to university as a mature student, thanks for the inspiration; and for so often providing a haven in which to put my thoughts on paper I send my love and appreciation to the Sisters of the Society of the Precious Blood at Burnham Abbey.

Dedications of books are always awkward for, after all those 'thank yous', who is to be the subject of these last words? I have chosen to look specifically to the future and to those students whose love of history I now help to foster. My former and current students, whose enthusiasm for this book has been (and is) infectious, have given me the energy to push the work to its conclusion. The challenge now is to maintain that delight in the study of history for years to come, both for them and for those who follow them. I hope, in some small measure, by dedicating this book to them, it will aid that ambition.

Portsmouth, 2010