Acknowledgements

I would like to thank the editors of this series, Sharon Monteith and Nahem Yousaf, for their astute reading and for their critical but kind comments. Thanks are also due to Matthew Frost and Kim Walker at Manchester University Press for patient advice on all the administrative and contractual things that I am no good at.

Thanks are certainly due to friends and colleagues who have supported me during the writing of this book, read and given feedback on various sections and indulged my desire to talk about Lethem all the time. Special thanks to Oliver Harris and Tim Lustig at Keele University and to Joe Brooker at Birkbeck. Thanks also to those members of the Research Institute for the Humanities at Keele who granted me Research Fellowship time to complete the manuscript. I would like to thank Adam Gearney, whose excellent paper on As She Climbed at the Lethem symposium (10 July 2010 at Birkbeck, London) showed me the relevance of Nietzsche's work to the novel.

As usual, Sheena, Bonnie and Ruby deserve the highest love and respect simply for putting up with me. And, of course, I would like to thank Jonathan Lethem for granting me an interview, for his encouraging comments and for his walking tour of the neighbourhoods that inspired Motherless Brooklyn and The Fortress of Solitude.

The author gratefully acknowledges permission to reproduce in altered form portions of 'Jonathan Lethem's Genre Evolutions' published in Journal of American Studies 43.3 (December 2009) and portions of "'New York and yet not New York": Reading the Region in Contemporary Brooklyn Fictions' published in European Journal of American Studies 2008.2. The full interview I conducted with Lethem is cited as 'Personal Interview, 2009' in order to distinguish it from the version published in The Adirondack Review and cited as 'Peacock, 2009'.