ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

Intellectual debts and the debts of friendship are, for this book, happily hard to disentangle. This is the case for the Centre for Medieval Studies at the University of York, where a lot of the thinking, reading and talking about this volume took place, and it is especially true of Peter Biller, Natasha Glaisyer, Matthew Townend and Elizabeth Tyler, who, individually and together, offered much of its stimulation and support. More recently, at Oxford, David Leopold, Myfanwy Lloyd and Jane Garnett have sympathised and cajoled in equal measure, each of them providing a source of patience, counsel and perspective for which I will always be grateful. To Kirstin Gwyer I owe all this but also so much more – a debt which, with Zoë Elizabeth, will take at least a lifetime, I hope, to reciprocate. In addition, Marianne Ailes, Katya Andreyev, Henry Bainton, Susan Brigden, Geoff Cubitt, Cliff Davies, David d'Avray, Simon Ditchfield, Mark Edwards, Brian FitzGerald, Roy Flechner, David Ganz, Perry Gauci, György Geréby, Peter Ghosh, Matthew Grimley, Gillian Hargreaves, Kim Kempshall, Sylvia Kempshall, Jörn Leonhard, Simon Loseby, Caroline Mawson, Mark Philpott, Tom Pickles, Gervase Rosser, Lucinda Rumsey, David Rundle, John Sabapathy, Hannah Skoda, George Southcombe, Jeremy Trevett, Martin Whittingham, Mark Whittow and Lucy Wooding have all, at various stages, been kind enough to be, as well as sound, encouraging. So too has a succession of undergraduate and graduate historians at Oxford, mostly at Wadham College, for whom this book was largely written. Other debts are more straightforward and material – to the Arts and Humanities Research Council, to the Fellows of Wadham College, and to the Faculty of Modern History at Oxford, all of whom supported a year's sabbatical leave. Publication of this book, meanwhile, is due primarily to the long-suffering kindness of Emma Brennan at Manchester University Press and of Ralph Footring, freelance production editor. Its dedication to Helen Whittingham, finally, is a small token of my appreciation for the love, support and example she has unfailingly provided to a devoted brother.
