Although this book has been four years in the making, its roots date back to my time as a philosophy undergraduate student where I encountered a paradox that articulates problems with defining vague predicates. As my journey into academia progressed, I later returned to the sorites paradox in an attempt to work through problems of borders, contestation and the limits of sovereign power in the Middle East where state power was becoming increasingly contested. It is the memory of a paradox that set me on this journey.

While focusing on the Middle East, this book was written in countless countries where I have had the benefit of engaging with many people from different backgrounds whose continued support has enriched the project and although some may disagree, kept me sane. I have been fortunate to have spent a good deal of time travelling across the region where I have, on the whole, been met with incredible kindness. A number of people gave up time to be interviewed and I am incredibly thankful for to everyone who spoke with me.

I have been lucky enough to present parts of this work at a range of institutions including Oxford, Harvard, St Andrews, King's College, Georgetown Doha, George Mason, the LSE, Aarhus, Brookings, People's College Nanded, Stockholm, Copenhagen and others, where I have received invaluable feedback. I am grateful to Carnegie Corporation for funding 'Sectarianism, Proxies and De-Sectarianisation' (SEPAD) and allowing me to explore particular aspects of this project, the wonderful team of SEPAD fellows whose presence on the project has facilitated my intellectual development and provided huge levels of emotional support.

At Lancaster University, I have been able to count on a number of wonderful colleagues and a cohort of incredible PhD students who have read parts of this work. In particular, I must thank Rashed Al Rasheed, Meysam Tayebipour, Ali Seyadrazaghi, Adel Ruished, Amel Houna, Bekir Varoglu, Thanos Trappelides, Elias Ghazal, Ana Kumarasamy, Samira Nasirzadeh, Sukru Cildir, Eyad Al Refai, Mike Todman and David Waines who worked through the book in a reading group. Edith Szanto read through my engagement with Agamben and provided invaluable encouragement. Of course, any mistakes remain mine alone.

I must also thank a number of people who have welcomed me into their homes and humoured me while I shut myself away to write. In particular, Amu, Chris and their cats were wonderful hosts, plying me with coffee and all manner of sweet things, although they were of little use helping us escape a locked room. Others including Mark (my Impact Narrative co-host), Matt, Nupa, Joe and Upasna, Robert, Momma (and Jazz!), Mukti, Brian and Sarah, Robert and Sigrun, Shantanu, Chris and Supri offered welcome distractions from the difficult times.

I must thank Rob Byron and Tony Mason at Manchester University Press who have been wonderful to work with, offering a huge amount of support for the project and my work more broadly. Tony expressed a great deal of support for the idea in its infancy while Rob later guided it through the treacherous ground of completing the manuscript and I am forever thankful for their support.

I must thank my family who have been everything that anyone could have wished for and much, much more. I am blessed to have an incredibly supportive family that while spread across the world, comes together incredibly well. A good chunk of this book was proofread as we were celebrating our Indian wedding in 2018 in Hyderabad and Goa where I was fortunate to draw support from Lynne, Sylvia, Ed, John, Andrea, Trudi, Dave, Sakshi, Rucha, Sutti, Sandesh, Teja, Tarun, Ami and Ramya. I was also able to draw inspiration from spending time with our wonderful nephews and nieces, Pingu, Simba and Bambi.

Lastly, I must thank my immediate family who helped me survive an incredibly difficult few years. They have been a constant source of support in the writing process and life more broadly. I am deeply sad that Deda is not here to see the finished version of the book, but I am proud that I was able to talk at the People's College, Nanded – in his presence – the place where his father taught astrophysics. Finally, I must thank my wife, to whom this book is dedicated. She has offered endless support, enthusiasm, criticism, distraction, praise and love. She is the person who has supported me throughout this project but most importantly, has helped me to navigate the precarious terrain of life. I am eternally thankful to her for her presence in my life.

All of this has seen me through; until the next one.

Thank you.
