Writing this book has been a life-changing journey, in which many friends, colleagues, and mentors played an essential role.

Mark Philp and Jon Parkin introduced me to the worlds of Politics and History at Oxford and remained supervisors long after I completed my DPhil. I am grateful beyond words for their endless kindness and patience and for their strikingly complementary guidance and advice. Mark has been a model teacher who, despite the amazing scope of his knowledge, has always gently directed me to find the answers to my own questions. Jon taught me everything I know about the kind of study I ended up doing. His own work on Hobbes’s reception has set a standard that I could only aspire to meet. That Anticlereical Legacies may be considered a successor to his Taming the Leviathan is the best compliment I might receive.

My work on this book has benefited immensely from several research fellowships and residences, including at the John W. Kluge Center at the Library of Congress, the Folger Shakespeare Library, the Lady Davis Trust at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, and the Humphrey Institute at Ben-Gurion University of the Negev. I would particularly like to thank Aya Elyada, Raz Chen-Morris, and the History Department at the Hebrew University. It is hard to overstate the significance of this kind of support, both materially and mentally, especially in today’s academic world. Independence is not always a bliss in this profession, but being able to write large parts of this book in sunny Spain or snowy New England truly was. I am grateful for the wonderful friends and colleagues I have acquired in each of these places and institutes. The breadth of their interests and expertise has been inspirational.

Many kind scholars made me think harder about the issues that I explore here, sending this book in multiple new directions. My mentors at Tel Aviv University, Tamar Meisels and Golan Lahat, were the first to encourage me to pursue this project. David Armitage, Noel Malcolm, Quentin Skinner, Patricia Springborg, and other members of the European Hobbes Society offered vital insights along the way. Mark Knights generously shared his important findings with me. Robin Mills and Maeve Mckeown were especially helpful readers. Robin Douglass consistently provided detailed feedback that was both exceptionally valuable and impossibly quick. Justin Champion was one of the most knowledgeable historians I have ever met, and I am grateful for having had the opportunity to learn from him. His work on English anticlericalism was ground-breaking and I hope that this book helps to honour his legacy.

I am very grateful to Manchester University Press, especially to the Series Editors of Politics, Culture and Society in Early Modern Britain, to Meredith Carroll, and to the generous reviewers for the pleasant, productive, and uncompromising review process. My final vision for the book is indebted to them.

The friends who accompanied me on this decade-long journey had to learn more about Hobbes and deism than they probably ever wished, as Shai Hertz, Kfir Ifrah, and Sharon Shemesh can attest. Yuna Han, Dana Landau, Shiru Lim and many others have always been there to listen and advise. Dear old and new friends from around the world shared the small and big moments, celebrating the achievements or complaining about the setbacks. They are the ones who made it all worthwhile, and I am grateful for having them in my life.

My family made this book possible in countless ways. My research has often taken me far from them—further than I ever imagined I would get—yet we have only grown closer throughout these years through new adventures, travels, and cocktails. My English family, with whom I was fortunate to connect thanks to this research, immediately created a home for me. This book is dedicated to Raphi, Daphna, Shai, Amit, Lior, Rotem, Ora, and Kathryn as well as to the memory of Merlin and Dina.

Lastly, my partner, Yoel Castillo Botello, entered my life at a crucial stage of this process, and from the very first moment believed in me much more consistently than I did. His unconditional love and support throughout the last six years make this book his as much as it is mine.
