I gladly acknowledge the help and backing of Shaun Gregory and Davina Miller, the two colleagues who were heads of the Department of Peace Studies at Bradford University during the period when this book was researched and written, for giving me the space to pursue work on it. Owen Greene deserves thanks for ensuring that I obtained several small grants which enabled me to make research trips to Brussels in 2006 and 2007. A wide range of people were willing to talk to me on and off the record about the EU's engagement with Romania and the response of different political and social forces there. They included members of the European Commission, from junior to very senior levels, who had worked both in Brussels and Romania itself as members of different Directorates or else of the Delegation over a ten-year period. I am grateful to Monica Macovei and Madeleine Crohn for putting their knowledge about the struggle to reform the justice system before me and for allowing me to see first hand the commitment they showed towards trying to achieve that indispensable end. Liesolotte Millitz-Stoica was a constant source of encouragement, ensuring that my interest in Romania never flagged during the last three years. With Armand Goșu, Gelu Trandafir and Valentina Pop, I had engrossing discussions which helped clarify a number of my ideas about the subject of the book. Lavinia Stan and Mark Gilbert were two academics with whom I had very fruitful debates. During the final stages of the book I enjoyed several meetings with Vladimir Tismăneanu, who realises how crucial proper engagement with the rest of Europe is if Romania is to try and erase the destructive legacy of its communist decade, and I am glad that whatever misunderstandings occurred between us in years past have been laid to rest.

Jim Brooker ensured that I was free from many preoccupations and distractions that would have delayed the completion of the project and for such backing he deserves enormous thanks. Willie Huppertz provided me with a tranquil base in Portugal from which to work on this project over extended periods. Chris Ciupe was enormously helpful with editing tasks and helped to ensure the publication was delivered on time. Finally, responsibility for the contents of this book, and for any mistakes to be found in it, lies with me.
